

Once upon a time in the early 70s, a few LSE students stood up for marginalized groups in society and made history by making the world see that gays and lesbians are not the demons that many thought they were because of the misinformation spread by the haters. One of the main heroes, Bob Mellors, was sadly killed in 1996 at the age of 46.

These days, others are under attack and portrayed as evil. Not only trans people are vilified! Drag artists are also condemned as sick and child abusers. And from here it will be a small step to harass men who are a bit too feminine and women who are not feminine enough. The bathroom police will be busy evaluating who is allowed to go where.

At this crucial point in time, the LSE “leadership” is taking the lead in turning back the clock and they are being praised by conservative rightwing media outlets because of their decision to leave Stonewall.

- i. When will people no longer feel the need to discriminate against particular minorities?
- ii. When will supposedly educated people no longer facilitate this condensation?
