

Since they did not understand one another, each was able to sustain an illusion about the other, which was the usual beginning of love, if not truth.

Each affair began as though the creation of the world was to be reenacted, and each usually ended in less time than it took the Old Testament Creator to put up the sky.